Preliminary Address.

THE unbounded patronage with which BOYLE'S Court and City Guide has been honored—the flattering encomia beſtowed by the higher Circles on the Utility of the performance—operated on the mind of its editor but as a ſtimulus to future exertion. Although the advantage of the publication was univerſally acknowledged, as greatly facilitating public convenience in paying viſits, &c. yet ſomething appeared wanting in its application to the faſhionable circles. While it ſupplied the Merchant in his counting-houſe, and the Nobleman or Gentleman, newly arrived in the metropolis, with many a wiſhed-for reference, its plan extended not to any arrangement of the multiplied connexions in politer life: theſe, to this very hour, are wholly left to chance—conſtitute employ for recollection—or elſe, are reſigned to the care of a ſervant.

It is preſumed, that the plan here offered to the public will remedy the defect: it will preſent, at one view, to the Lady of Faſhion, and thoſe honored with her viſits—to the Nobleman—and the Gentleman—an accurate arrangement of viſits paid and received, which never could be furniſhed by the moſt retentive memory, and could alone be produced by the moſt laborious attention.

P. BOYLE presumes to suggest the utility of this publication:—He flatters himself, that he has hereby reduced to a system the first acknowledged felicity of polished society—friendly, learned, and fashionable intercourse. A saving accrues from this plan of full one third of the great labor and expence in servants time and trouble, in coaches, in horses, chairs, &c. &c. A servant here has his morning's duty before him—he proceeds methodically, and executes his orders correctly, and devoid of those blunders into which a bad or an overcharged memory, or a want of knowing the town, must precipitate even the most attentive; and, when it is recollected, that a servant newly come into place, particularly if from the country, is a considerable time before he becomes acquainted with the usual visits of a family, still further proof of usefulness, it is presumed, will be established;—the horses will be relieved from a full third of their labor—and, the visits being paid in a third of the time, will afford opportunity of devoting to particular friendships those additional moments, which must be highly gratifying to the susceptible and the intelligent.

As the work classes the parts of the west end of the town in four different divisions, the trouble will be obviated of the tedious and repeated writings in each day's visit of the rout taken.

—And

—And, what is far more important, every visit intended for the morning's excursion regularly meeting the eye, the purchasers of the VISITING GUIDE will no longer have to lament, that amid the hurry and confusion of numerous visits, the most intimate friendships of their hearts have frequently escaped them, from the failure of recollection and the want of such a guide.

To render the work still more complete, two columns are added in each page—one for letters received — the other for their answers — by which the purchasers will be greatly assisted in maintaining a regular communication with their correspondents.

The Plan on which the work is executed is briefly presented to the eye in the titles; and the forms of writing in the names may be seen in the following page; it would therefore be superfluous here to repeat either——The Editor feels it his duty humbly to present his unfeigned acknowledgements to the Gentleman who first suggested to him the idea of this work, which he received from the condescension of a Nobleman.—He hopes that his assiduity, and the correctness of his past publications will be his pledge for accuracy in the present undertaking, and its effectual recommendation to the support of those distinguished characters, for whose accommodation it is intended.
